Sub Topic : Notary Public Seals

Notary public seals disclose that the documents are genuine, all parties agree to the terms and conditions, and that the identity of all persons signing them is confirmed. Important papers such as affidavits, mortgage documents or papers related to bankruptcy filing must be notarized so as to establish their legitimacy. Notary public seals found in birth certificates or identification cards guarantee that these documents are genuine.

In general, notary public seals include stamps, embossers and those created by electronic means. Only seals manufactured by a permit holder can be sold, duplicated or offered for sale. This requirement includes replacement seals for those previously manufactured. Permission for manufacturing notary public seals can be gained by submitting a completed application. The format of the application form is prescribed by the Secretary of State along with an issuing fee.

A notary public seal contains the name of the notary public, the state seal, the words 'notary public', the filing county shown on the certificate of authorization, the notary public commission expiration date, the notary public commission number and the manufacturer identification number. Notary public seals are available in circular or rectangular shapes, with a serrated or milled edged border. The circular seal is not over two inches and the rectangular one is not more than one inch in width by two and one-half inches in length.

Notary public seals are unique to the person using it, capable of verification, under the sole control of the person using it, and accepted in the same format and appearance as transmitted. A manufacturer produces a notary seal only upon the presentation of a certificate of authorization issued by the Secretary of State for the making of that particular seal.

The lack of notary public seals shall not make the acts of a notary invalid if his official title is affixed. But, if the documents are to be filed in another state or used in another country, the seal is strongly suggested. Many states are unwilling to receive documents that do not contain a notary public seal.

Sub Topic : New Jersey DUI Contingency Attorneys

New Jersey DUI contingency attorneys are those lawyers who are willing to handle cases on contingency basis in New Jersey. These are cases where a client does not have to pay any fees to the lawyer unless he wins. And if he wins, a percentage of the recovery will be offered as fee. This type of fee arrangement is a good option for many individuals who seek legal representation. It is also a great help for those people who are not able to pay some amount to the lawyer at the beginning of the case.

Normally, the contingency fee for a lawyer depends upon the financial outcome of the case or the percentage of the amount awarded. This can change from state to state and lawyer to lawyer. These are finalized after considering factors such as the type of case, and the phase at which recovery is completed. But, the usual contingency rate in New Jersey is one-third of the total fee. Some New Jersey DUI contingency attorneys charge higher percentages as fees. This is because some people think that if you provide them a little more money, then they will fight harder to get the desired outcome.

Usually, almost all New Jersey DUI contingency attorneys make a written document on the contingent fee and the method by which the fee is determined. To make out a best deal, a client and an attorney must work out a fee agreement in such a way that both are satisfied with the upfront result.

The best hunt for New Jersey DUI contingency attorneys is the Internet. There are many lawyer groups and agencies dealing with the DUI cases. Therefore, before making a deal, create all written documents including the contingent fee agreement so that in future there will not be any problem with the fees.

Sub Topic : Birth Injury Related Cerebral Palsy

For most parents, the birth of a child is an exciting and joyous experience. But, nowadays, around 3 to 4 percent newborns suffer from birth related injuries. In the United States, cerebral palsy has become a serious birth related injury which affects approximately 5000 to 10,000 infants each year.

There are different types of birth related injuries that may happen before, during, or after the birth of a child. Although there are several types of birth injuries, one of the most popular and common type of birth injury is cerebral palsy.

Rather than a disease, cerebral palsy in newborn babies is a physical condition that is caused by brain damage before, during, or after birth. There are four different types of cerebral palsy- spastic cerebral palsy, ataxic cerebral palsy, athetoid cerebral palsy, and mixed cerebral palsy. Each type of cerebral palsy has its own characteristics. Of the four types of cerebral palsy, spastic cerebral palsy is the most common type which accounts for eighty percent of all cases today in the United States.

Birth injury related cerebral palsy is usually caused by birth asphyxia (lack of oxygen during the birth process), a complex condition which is difficult to predict or prevent. Premature birth, low birth weight, hemorrhage in the child's brain, an infection or illness in the mother like rubella, toxoplasmosis; intrauterine exposure to drugs or alcohol are other reasons for birth injury related cerebral palsy.

Even though doctors and nurses are trained to identify symptoms of cerebral palsy, in most cases they fail to recognize the problem of brain injury in newborn babies. This failure may lead to birth injury related cerebral palsy. When cerebral palsy is caused due to birth injury (negligence), it becomes a case of medical malpractice .The parents of victims can claim for compensation for life long care. With the help of a cerebral palsy lawyer, victims can easily win compensation for medical malpractice.
